more space!' she said.

Founded in 1970, the 30-strong team of archivists aim to keep a 'small representation' of everything, Carroll explained.

For example, if a recently wrapped movie has 250 lavish costumes, including four or five for each of the heroes, the archive team will select 'a couple of iconic looks from each character' for posterity.

Even with this selective approach, every time a film wraps, 'we could be adding hundreds of things' to the archive, said Carroll.

Among the studio's most treasured memorabilia are the giant storybooks featured at the start of 'Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs' and 'Sleeping Beauty,' and a crystal slipper from the live action version of Cinderella.

tral Paris.

They were shown alongside the Italian designer's typically light and floaty creations in organic silk mouseline and tulle, along with silk dresses and satin jackets.

The tutu creations will now return to the Paris Opera as costumes for a special heritage day show in September, she said, with plans to continue the exchange in future.

'It's the first stage of a new project. The Opera is very engaged with upcycling. Something that was going to be thrown away, we can do something beautiful, and I think this sends an important message,' said Crociani.

'Sustainability comes from approaching each piece like a treasure. If you do that, you understand it can't just be thrown away, and if you don't want it anymore, you must give it to someone else who will appreciate it,' she added.
